All Souls' Day in Munich, Bavaria. To the editor of the Washington Star:

A recent letter from Ross Turner to a relative in this city contains the following description of All Souls' Day in Munich. If you should consider the article worthy of a place in the Star, you would confer a favor by publish-T.

* * * I never fully realized that feeling of reverence with which the Catholic people of Bayaria seem to hold "All Saints' Day," and the next following one "All Souls' Day," until this year, when it was almost by accident brought to my notice. As I was passing the "Court church of St. Michael," I met a friend who was just coming out; he remarked upon the beauty of the music in the requiem, now nearly ended. I entered, and one of the first things that attracted my attention was a mag nificent catafalque in the centre of the church, which was blazing with lights so that the black velvet pall and flowers were quite lost in the glare, and made a spectacle of deep interest. The solemn organ's tone resounded through the church again, and the choir began the "La chrymosa" in that grandest hy mn of all ages, the "Dies irae."

"Lachrymosa dies illa, Jua resurget ex favilla Judicandus homo reus.

The strains of solemn music--crowds of derout worshippers-the faint off of incense that intense feeling for the dead-even the old, dusty, time worn tombs, before which lights' were burning, and hung with funeral wreaths, impressed me to an extraordinary degree. The services being brought to a close, a procession of priests, robed in black, left the alter and pro couded to the royal vaute, immediately beneath, by stairways on either side. These stairways are closed by slabs of scope, and are never opened exc-pt once in each year, or to receive the remains of those entitled by divine right or blood to rest here. I followed the crowd, and descended. The largest room, I should think about thirty feet equare, with a low ceiling, bad nothing at al! remarkable in its appearance .-It was illuminated with numerous lights, and a ALEXAN DRIA. - - - VIRGINIA. number of the King's body guard were present | NT OTI CE. as a guard of honor. I can hardly imagine a more s'riking costume than theirs-a white coat elaborately embreidered in light blue and silver, golden epaulets, a steel helmet, upon which is the King's arms in gold, and a superb white plume hanking down the back; tight blue pantalnone, and high riding boots. They stood in dazzliog relief from the dust and mold of even this royal vault. A glance around gave to my eyes a rather novel sight, I can assure you. On either side was a collection of coffine. large and small, some covered with inscriptions and decerations, and I should judge them to be made of lead; one of them was evidently of the Rococo style, and was especially noticeable. Over the whole was thrown a pall, which was here and there lifted to show grinning skulls, while at the head was no immense cushion, upon which rested the crown and ragalia, and wreaths and garlands of flowers, all in led. But for the monotony of colors the effect would have been fine, Here rests one of the old "Kurtursts," whose name has long passed from the memories of most men. Although this coffin was several conturies old there was no perceptible difference from the coffins of Eugene Beauharoais and his wife, the daughter of Maximilian, Joseph the 1st, who died to 1821, I believe. In the church above is a magnificent monument to Thoywalempress of Brazil. In this vault rests many of the Kurfursis of Bavaria with their families, the most of them quite forgotten. William the 5th alone escapes the fate-his monument is the spiendid church itself. Among all this and entertainments. great company of departed grandeur, the son of a French planter, Eugene Beauharnais, comes in for the greatest share of notice, and why? Because Napoleon married his mother; such is fame founded upon circumstances. The crowd pass slowly on in silence; pass the rows of leaden ouffics from one of a later date. buried is flowers and brilliant with many lights to some little baby prince, who died ever and ever so many years ago, whose parents are here too as well as generations then unborn. The throng locked in cold curiosity upon all this, and read on the tablets in the wall the names and titles. As I went up into the sunlight which fills the church, I thought that cremation was better than the way they did it beneath-an urn containing the ashes of a king or duke would be much more interesting to look upon than those long leaden boxes with the same amount of royal dust.

I then went down to the church which contains the remains of two of the dead kings of Bavaria, Max Joseph, the 1st, and Maxmilian. the 21. (Ludwir, the 1st, lies in the magnifi cent Basilica of St. Bouilaca, which he built during his reign.) The royal vault in this church is quire small, nothing remarkable in its appearance-raised a few inches from the floor, and behind a gateway in a sort of a bake oven speriure are the and tried and some new variaties. Caralogues coffice of Max Joseph the lat, and Max mailed free to any address upon application. To Emmanual, who was so signally defeated market gardeners and large nurchasers except by the Duke of Mariborough at the bairle of Blindheim, or Blenheim, July 21st, 1704. I am certain, from their portraits, that petther of these gentlemen ever occupied less apace while living than they do at the present time; and I can further say that many of our merchant princes have more comfortable and elegant rest ing places than these two most il ustrious of the powerful and wealthy house of Wittelsback. These kings were too wise to spend immense sums on vaults, but left behind greater monuments in the way of permanent benefits for their people. Above, in one of the side chapils, is the tomb of the much loved Maximilian the 21. His remains rest in an elegant sarcoph agus, which was literally covered by loads of wreaths, palms and flowers. Tall wax candles, in golden candles icks, shed a soft glow over the whole. At the same time the widowed queen was praying before it, with a sad heart, no doubt, for be was an excellent father to his family as well as king to his people.

cometery, the "Gottesacker." Here was a spectacle which astonished me more than apything I had seen. The vast interior was one mass of floral and other decorations, in many cases covering the monuments from the base to the top, and the entire lot besides—which are not as large as with us generally—a whole family will be buried in a lot 6 by 6 feet. The burial place is bought for a term of years, fourteen, I believe; if not repurchased the tomb stones are removed, and the let resold. Not a grave is dug but turns up the skulls, &c., of the Munich forefathers. I am told the graves in the older part were ten times deep. Here are beds and bowers of hot heuse plants, garland and wreaths of all colors, shapes and sizes, natural and artificial, and in addition to this dis play there are various colored lanteres and lights, flickering like tropical fireflies. Among the green, and in strong contrast, the various military monuments were gorgeous in fligs, festoons, silk bands in the Bavarian and German colors. I cannot begin to tell you all I saw in a walk through only a very small portion of this great place-family vaults and chapels, and before the altars keeeling throogs of peo ple; tablets in the walls before which were candles burning, and from vessels of holy water the passer by would sprinkle the graves benestb. Here is Kaulbach's grave, one of the simplest yet a grand pices of art with a large tablet of bronze, upon which a female figure typilying art rises and scatters flowers on the grave beneath. Upon the base of polished black marble is his name-"Wilhelm Vou Kaalbach;" simply his name, nothing more is needed-the great compositions, ideas and thoughts ex-pressed in his works have left behind him a greater monument than acres of inscriptions or shafts that would reach the clouds. Not far from the grave is the Dead House, a sort of morgue; but let me give you some idea how they manage such things in Munich. When one dies, a person known as the "corpse frau" is notified, who at once takes possession of the body and arranges it for turial. Within three hours the body must be carried to the Dead House, a dismal looking house. When the pall bearers arrive, or the watchers as they are called, the body is placed on the inclined table, and lies in state for three days. Around the coffin are flowers and lights according to the taste and wealth of the people. During the three days the body is carefully watched, and over each corpse, within easy reach is a bellpull, so that in case of a resusciation the alarm can at once by given. One side of the Deal House has large windows, through which you get a view of the whole proceedings, and a very ghastly sight, according to my mind, it is. Some of the bodies look wonderfully life like; others looked unpleasantly dead. Throughout the whole day the cemetery was thronged, as well as the numerous churches, where solemn memorial services were held. It s. tems to me no day in the whole year can be m are interesting to the stranger than "Ali
